Introduction:-

Psychologists have described many behavioral aspects of a person based on eye reactions. For instance, if your teenage son does not look you in the eye while answering a question, he is probably not being entirely honest. 'Anger flashed in her eyes' is a statement we have all heard which is used to describe an angry person. So, eyes are 'reflectors' of our emotions. In that sense they are certainly 'windows' through which others can 'see' us.

But there is more! That the eyes, especially the iris, is a pointer to an individual's health status is the basis of a separate branch of study called Iridology. To iridologists then, the eyes are 'windows' to a person's health. Iridologists study the iris, pupil and sclera paying particular attention to the color and markings in these parts of the eye. They then compare the results to an iris chart, which divides the iris into various zones that correspond with different parts of the body. The diagnosis is based on any discrepancy that the comparison may reveal. Yet another 'window' approach declares that the color of a person's eye is an indicator of one's personality and ability. The color of one's eyes reflects individuality- it depends entirely on the genetic make-up of the individual! The amount and type of color pigment in the iris defines eye color. In humans, phenotypically, eye color falls into one of these basic categories -brown, blue or green.

Brown eyes are the most common (due to their dominant nature), followed by blue and then green. Other eye colors are variants that occur due to different ratios of color pigments present in the iris. Consequently, apart from the above-mentioned three colors, we also see people who have black eyes (Native Americans and Asians), hazel, gray, green and violet eyes (Europeans and their descendants). These marvelous eye colors have been indicated to reflect many a personality trait. Accordingly, brown eyes symbolize sharpness, blue eye, sweetness and green eyes, mischievousness. Various observations and studies have revealed interesting pointers. For instance, dark-eyed people seem to score more in areas of social skills, emotions and neurotic behavior than light-eyed people.
